This is a real concern to me. One, we don't understand what cost this is to BP and their partners and secondly much of the capital now will hit in 2010 rather than 2009. Not sure where we are with giving approval to participate but I think based on this new information that has not been disclosed by BP we need another few weeks to make our decision to participate and fully understand the commitment and timing. Obviously this is important information and we need to understand the impact. Jim or Nick can you help me understand where we are with BP at this time. I am extremely dissatisfied that BP has not disclosed this to us.

I talked to Transocean today and they said the Marianas has not returned to work since TS Ida and will most likely disconnect from its moorings and go into the shipyard for about 30 days. The damage was to electric cable trays that resulted from leaving the rig at drilling draft during the storm event. The rig personnel were evacuated. The electrical cables are impacting the 3 and 4 anchor winches as well as some of the drilling equipment.

Transocean Marianas Suffers Light Damage from Tropical Storm Ida (N. America - US GOM)
The Transocean Marianas, a deepwater moored semisub, suffered damage during Tropical Storm Ida. The damage is very minimal and will not prevent the rig from resuming operations. The rig was on BP's Macondo prospect in Mississippi Canyon 252. The contract with BP runs through December 2009 at dayrate in the mid-$440s. Once the BP contract is complete, the rig will then go to work for ENI for two years in the US Gulf of Mexico.
